

MOOD AND MODAL CONCORD IN SPANISH DIRECTIVE CLAUSES: AN UPDATE TO FAULKNER (2022B)

Tris Faulkner
Kalamazoo College

ABSTRACT. According to Faulkner (2022b), in the case of Spanish, “indicative directive complements are strongly preferable to subjunctive clauses when a weak necessity and teleological matrix directive embeds a modal verb of equivalent strength and type” (p. 8). She explains that the exceptionality of this phenomenon relates to both predicates being interpreted in concord with one another. Having compared and analyzed several authentic examples of mood use in this context (see Faulkner 2021b, 2022a, 2022b), Faulkner, consequently, suggests that, in spite of being labeled core selectors of the subjunctive (e.g., Villalta 2008), if a modal concord construction is to come into play, the mood of the particular directive complement is affected. However, unbeknownst to Faulkner (2022b) at the time of publishing, this symbiotic relationship between modal concord and mood is not exclusive to matrix and subordinate directives that are weak necessity (of strength) and teleological (of type). Concord readings may, in fact, be evoked in contexts in which both the matrix and embedded predicates are, for example, either deontic and strong necessity or boulethic and strong necessity. In other words, if the two expressions parallel each other in strength and priority, an indicative modal complement, interpreted in concord with the main directive, is likely to result; and, most importantly, whether or not the two modal elements are teleological and weak necessity.

RESUMEN. Según Faulkner (2022b), en el caso del español, “los complementos directivos, indicativos son fuertemente preferibles a las cláusulas subjuntivas cuando un directivo principal, de tipo “teleológico” y de fuerza “necesidad débil”, tiene un verbo subordinado, modal de fuerza y tipo equivalentes” (p. 8). Explica que la excepcionalidad de este fenómeno se relaciona con ambos predicados interpretándose en concordancia entre sí. Después de haber comparado y analizado varios ejemplos auténticos del uso de modo en este contexto (véase Faulkner 2021b, 2022a, 2022b), Faulkner sugiere que, a pesar de ser etiquetados como seleccionadores principales del subjuntivo (por ejemplo, Villalta 2008), si una construcción de concordancia modal entra en juego, el modo del complemento directivo particular se ve afectado. Sin embargo, sin que Faulkner (2022b) lo supiera en el momento de la publicación, esta relación simbiótica entre la concordancia modal y el modo verbal, no es exclusiva de verbos directivos, principales y subordinados que son de fuerza “necesidad débil” y tipo “teleológico”. Las interpretaciones de concordancia pueden, de hecho, evocarse en contextos en los que, tanto los predicados principales como los subordinados, son, por ejemplo, “deonticos” o “volitivos” de tipo y de “necesidad fuerte”. En otras palabras, si las dos expresiones son de la misma fuerza y prioridad, es probable que resulte un complemento modal, indicativo, interpretado en concordancia con el verbo directivo, principal; y, lo más importante es que no importa si los dos elementos modales son “teleológicos” y o de “necesidad débil”.

1. Introduction

1.1. Concord

According to Huitink (2012), the term CONCORD, as understood by linguists, refers to the phenomenon by which a sentence containing more than one operator, is interpreted as if only a singular operator were present. Correspondingly, the phrase MODAL CONCORD, pertains to statements with two modal elements, being understood as exclusively involving one (Geurts and Huitink 2006; Halliday 1970; Zeijlstra 2007). For this to occur, each modal element has to parallel the other with respect to both PRIORITY, otherwise known as TYPE (e.g., teleological, deontic, bouletic, epistemic, etc.), and STRENGTH, also deemed QUANTIFICATIONAL FORCE (i.e., universal vs. existential quantification, e.g., - STRONG NECESSITY; WEAK NECESSITY; WEAK, etc.) (e.g., Geurts and Huitink 2006; Huitink 2012; Zeijlstra 2007). However, before delving further into the specifics of this concept (which, as related to Spanish, is the focal point of this article), it might be helpful to first, introduce examples of these distinctions.

1.2. Modal Types and Strengths

As related to modal types, under the umbrella of SENTENTIAL modality, we may have DEONTIC (i.e., “rule-based” modal elements, e.g., ‘must’, ‘to be mandatory that’, etc.), BOULETIC (i.e., “desire-focused” modals, e.g., ‘should’, ‘could’, etc.), and TELEOLOGICAL (i.e., “goal-oriented” modal operators, e.g., ‘recommend that’, ‘to have to’, etc.) modal predicates. In terms of strength, one might differentiate between WEAK or POSSIBILITY modals (e.g., ‘might’, ‘may’, ‘to have to’, etc.) and STRONG or NECESSITY modals (e.g., ‘must’, ‘to have to’, ‘to be obligatory that’, etc.) – the latter, which can be further subdivided into STRONG NECESSITY (e.g., ‘must’, ‘to be required that’, ‘to be necessary that’, etc.) and WEAK NECESSITY, modal forms (e.g., ‘recommend that’, ‘suggest that’, ‘should’, etc.) (e.g., Portner 2018). The examples below seek to distinguish between these groupings.

- (1) Deontic:
 - a. All workers must pay their taxes. (Deontic and strong necessity (henceforth “SN”))
 - b. Visitors are required to park in lot B. (Deontic and SN)
 - c. All concert-goers have to be searched on entry. (Deontic and SN)
- (2) Bouletic:
 - a. You should wash the dishes before dinner; That way we’ll have plates to eat from/off of. (Bouletic and weak necessity (henceforth “WN”))
 - b. She has to call me tonight so that I can tell her what happened. (Bouletic and WN)
 - c. You could make macaroni and cheese instead; It’s my favorite. (Bouletic and WN)
- (3) Teleological:
 - a. You have to take bus number 32 to get to Main Street. (Teleological and WN)
 - b. She has to take one more comprehensive exam to become a PhD candidate. (Teleological and WN)
 - c. They recommend taking the first flight out in order for you to get to your destination on time. (Teleological and WN)

As observed by means of the examples above (1-3), there are certain modal operators that may express varying levels of quantificational force and “flavors” of modality (i.e., depending on the pragmatic context in question (e.g., von Fintel 2006; Portner 2018)). In other words, their classifications of strength and type are not mutually exclusive and, in fact, can change, as influenced (or determined) by the speaker or subject’s conversational intent. Thus, whereas ‘to have to’ in example (1c) refers to a rule or regulation that must compulsorily be abided by, its use in (2b) reveals the subject in question’s personal preference. Contrarily, in sentences (3a) and (3b), it serves the distinct function of indicating the sequenced steps that need to be carried out in order for the specified objective to be successfully fulfilled.

1.3. Modal Concord

With these designations in mind, let’s now get back to our initial discussion regarding concord between modal elements. In each of the seven examples below, we can recognize that two modal operators are present; and, that, in all cases, both are of similar priority and quantificational force. For this reason, the sentences are interpreted as if they contained only one (and not both) of the two modal forms (as exemplified by the bolded translations).

- (4) You may possibly have read my little monograph upon the subject. (modal type: epistemic; quantificational force: weak).

(Adapted from Geurts and Huitink 2006: 1)

It is possible that it is possible that you have read my little monograph upon the subject.

Final interpretation: ‘It is possible that you have read my little monograph upon the subject.’ Modal Concord (henceforth, “MC”)

- (5) Possibly this gazebo may have been built by Sir Christopher Wren. (modal type: epistemic; quantificational force: weak).

(Adapted from Halliday 1970: 328)

It is possible that it is possible that this gazebo had been built by Sir Christopher Wren.

Final Interpretation: ‘It is possible that this gazebo had been built by Sir Christopher Wren.’ MC

- (6) It is allowed that he may enter the room. (modal type: teleological; respective, quantificational forces: weak necessity and weak).

(Adapted from Zeijlstra 2007: 323)

It is permissible that he be permitted to enter the room.

Final interpretation: ‘It is permissible/permitted that he enter the room.’ MC

- (7) Power carts must mandatorily be used on cart paths where provided. (modal type: deontic; quantificational force: strong necessity).

(Adapted from Geurts and Huitink 2006: 1)

It is obligatory that there be an obligation to use power carts on cart paths where provided.

Final interpretation: ‘It is obligatory to use power carts on cart paths where provided.’

- (8) John must obligatorily read the books. (modal type: deontic; quantificational force: strong necessity).

(Adapted from Zeijlstra 2007: 325)

It is obligatory that there be an obligation that John read the books.

Final interpretation: ‘It is obligatory that John read the books.’

- (9) It must necessarily be the case. (modal type: epistemic; quantificational force: strong necessity).

(Adapted from Zeijlstra 2007: 323)

It is undeniable/certain that it is undoubtedly/undeniably/certainly the case.

Final interpretation: ‘It is definitely the case.’

- (10) The general demands that the troops must leave. (modal type: deontic; quantificational force: strong necessity;).

(Adapted from Zeijlstra 2007: 325)

The general demands that there be a demand that the troops leave.

Final interpretation: ‘The general demands that the troops leave.’

According to Zeijlstra (2007), modal concord can only be established, in environments like those of examples (4) through (10), where a modal auxiliary (in addition to, another modal element of equivalent type and strength) is specifically present. Accordingly, he asserts that, “an expression consisting of two, non-auxiliary, modal elements of the same type [(e.g., two modal: verbs (e.g., ‘to require that’ and ‘to be obligated that’); adverbs (e.g., ‘mandatorily’ and ‘obligatorily’); adjectives (e.g., ‘likely’ and ‘conceivable’); or nouns (e.g., ‘chance’ and ‘likelihood’))], [does not ever] yield a modal concord reading” (pp. 318-331). Sentences of this type would, instead, induce CUMULATIVE readings, where each operator is interpreted on its own, i.e., as carrying its own modal force. Items (11) through (14) below aim to support these premises:

- (11) The general demands that the troops be required to leave. (modal type: deontic; quantificational force: strong necessity; syntactic form: non-auxiliaries).

(Adapted from Zeijlstra 2007: 325)

‘The general demands that there be a demand that the troops leave.’

Cumulative (henceforth, “C”)

- (12) Maybe Mary has to leave. (respective, modal types: epistemic and deontic/teleological; respective, quantificational forces: weak and strong necessity/weak necessity; respective, syntactic forms: auxiliaries).

(Adapted from Zeijlstra 2007: 317)

‘It is possible that Mary is obligated to leave.’

- (13) John must be allowed to go out now. (respective, modal types: deontic and teleological; respective, quantificational forces: strong necessity and weak necessity; respective, syntactic forms: auxiliary, non-auxiliary).

(Adapted from Halliday 1970: 339)

'It is necessary that John be permitted to go out now'

C

- (14) It is allowed that he might enter the room. (respective, modal types: teleological and epistemic; respective, quantificational forces: weak necessity and weak; respective, syntactic forms: non-auxiliary, auxiliary).

(Adapted from Zeijlstra 2007: 323)

'It is permissible that he could enter the room.'

2. What Purpose Does Modal Concord Serve?

2.1. Modal Concord and Disambiguation

Because individual, modal operators may, at times, fluctuate between types and strengths, a second, modal element might be included in order to reinforce (e.g., Halliday 1970) or disambiguate (e.g., Huitink 2012) the underspecified, lexical item. For instance, in examples (15) and (16) to follow, ‘must’ (universal) and ‘may’ (existential) present some ambiguity. In (15), ‘must’ can be understood in its deontic sense, where Zephyr is required to be honest, as well as it could be interpreted as epistemic, in that the speaker is sharing their opinion regarding Zephyr’s character, i.e., their belief that Zephyr is an honest person. In a similar manner, ‘may’ in sentence (16), could refer to the speaker’s conferral of permission (i.e., that Zephyr is allowed to leave), or their impression of Zephyr’s intentions (i.e., that there is a possibility that Zephyr is planning on leaving).

(15)

- a. Zephyr must be honest. → Zephyr is required to be honest.
- b. Zephyr must be honest. → Zephyr is an honest person.

- c. Zephyr may leave the room. → Zephyr is allowed to leave the room.
- d. Zephyr may leave the room. → There is a chance that Zephyr is planning to leave the room.

In both cases, the addition of a secondary, modal element would significantly clarify the speaker’s intended message:

(17)

- e. Zephyr must obligatorily be honest. → Zephyr is required to be honest.
- f. Zephyr must certainly be honest. → Zephyr is an honest person.

(18)

- g. Zephyr may permissibly leave the room. → Zephyr is allowed to leave the room.
- h. Zephyr may possibly leave the room. → There is a chance that Zephyr is planning to leave the room.

A curious finding discussed in Faulkner (2022b), is that, in the case of Spanish, there exist specific contexts in which a modal concord interpretation may be insinuated by a speaker's choice of mood (i.e., subjunctive vs. indicative). Section 3 to follow has as its objective to expand on Faulkner's claims.

3. Faulkner (2022b)

3.1 Mood and Modal Concord in Spanish Directive Clauses

According to Faulkner (2022b), as concerns Spanish, in spite of being labeled core selectors of the subjunctive (e.g., Villalta 2008), the mood of a directive complement is influenced by both, the particular matrix directive at hand, in addition to the speaker's conversational intent. She states that, in some, select contexts, an indicative clause signals that the subordinate predicate is to be understood in concord with the matrix. This, Faulkner suggests, occurs only "when a weak necessity and teleological matrix directive embeds a modal verb of equivalent strength and type" (p. 8). This is interesting, not only because of the unexpected relationship between modal concord and verbal mood, but also since, unlike much of the previous literature (e.g., Anand and Brasoveanu 2010; Geurts and Huitink 2006; Halliday 1970; Watkowska 2021; Zeijlstra 2007), here, modal concord does not, necessarily, incorporate modal adverbs. She provides the following sentences as examples of this observation:

(19)

Recomiendan	que se _____ usen	en
Recommend.PRES.INDIC.3PL	that PASSIVE-REFL use.PRES.SUBJ.3PL	in
la fase temprana.
the phase early.

(respective, modal types: teleological and non-modal; respective, quantificational forces: weak necessity and non-modal)

(Adapted from Davies' Corpus del Español 2016-, as cited in Faulkner 2022b)

'They recommend that they be used in the early phase.'

(respective, modal types: teleological and deontic; respective, quantificational forces: weak necessity and strong necessity)

(Adapted from Davies' Corpus del Español 2016-, as cited in Faulkner 2022b)

'They recommend that it be obligatory to use them in the early phase.'

en la fase temprana (primeras 24 horas).

in the phase early (first 24 hours).

Those who defend its utilization recommend that they should be used in the early phase (during the first 24 hours).

(modal type: teleological; quantificational force: weak necessity)

(Adapted from Davies' Corpus del Español 2016-, as cited in Faulkner 2022b)

'Those who defend its utilization recommend that they should be used in the early phase (during the first 24 hours).' MC

(Adapted from Davies' Corpus del Español 2016-, as cited in Faulkner 2022b)

'As has already been mentioned previously, their trainer advises that the group of youths should focus first on their studies and later on, on sports.' MC

In examining examples (19) and (20) above, we may notice that, whereas (19) has only one modal operator (i.e., recomiendan que ‘they recommend that’), sentence (20) has two (i.e., recomiendan que ‘they recommend that’ and sea obligatorio ‘it be obligatory’); and, as traditional grammar would expect, both subordinate clauses appear in the subjunctive (p. 7). In the case of (19), neither a concord nor a cumulative reading is anticipated, since only one modal expression is present (p. 7). Conversely, as related to (20), because two modal elements of differing strengths and types are present (while recomendar ‘to recommend’, in this instance, might be deemed teleological and WN, ser obligatorio ‘to be obligatory’ is likely to be considered deontic and SN), “a cumulative [...] reading is manifested (e.g., Geurts and Huitink 2006; Zeijlstra 2007), [...] [as] the matrix and embedded predicates are understood as two distinct, modal expressions; i.e., there is a recommendation that there be an obligation to use the objects in question in the relevant early phase(s)” (Faulkner 2022b: 7). Put differently, “the matrix directive (recomiendan que ‘they recommend that’) is interpreted as introducing a second, directive instruction, which is that [said items] be [(made)] obligatory (Faulkner 2022b: 7)”. In contrast to (19) and (20), sentences (21) and (22) have their matrix and subordinate verbs paralleling each other with respect to both priority (teleological) and strength (WN) (p. 9). Curiously, as a result of this concord, that is, the subordinate modals in each (i.e., deben ‘they should’ (or ‘you all should’)) not being understood to carry additional modal force (pp. 8-13), the embedded clause appears in the indicative. In other words, a secondary (modal) instruction, accompanying that of the primary directive’s (i.e., recomiendan que ‘they recommend that’ and aconseja que ‘s/he advises that’ (or ‘you advise that')), is not evoked, as signaled by the use of an indicative verb. Faulkner discusses these points in the citation to follow:

In both the mono-modal [e.g., sentence (19)] and bi-modal contexts [e.g., sentence (20)] in which [the subjunctive] is required, the main verb of the subordinate clause (i.e., the predicate that directly follows que ‘that’) [is assumed to represent] the [speaker or subject’s preferred outcome or end result]. In mono-modal environments, the preference (i.e., the proposition) being [relayed (i.e., being directed, instructed, suggested, recommended, advised, etc.)] takes the form of a non-modal verb (e.g., Recomiendan que se usen... ‘They recommend that they be used...’), while in bi-modal environments, the subordinate verb [expected to lead] the comparative proposition is modal [e.g., Recomiendan que sea obligatorio... ‘They recommend that it be obligatory...’]. Since in the case of the latter [e.g., (20)], the matrix and subordinate modals are interpreted separately [(i.e., cumulatively, since the main and embedded directives are of differing types and strengths)], each has to carry its own modal force. This makes sense if we view the subjunctive as being tied to [or representative of] a comparison of alternatives or an ordering of preferences (as related to the comparison-based theory of mood selection – see Giorgi and Pianesi (1997) and Villalta (2008)). If we compare this [observation with] the bi-modal environments in which the indicative is used [e.g., sentences (21) and (22)], we see that, [unlike example (20)], the subordinate modals [in (21) and (22) contribute] no additional quantificational force [...]. Put differently, [the main and embedded directives are] not interpreted cumulatively [separately] and a concord construction is, instead, manifested. We could almost say that the presence of the subordinate modal is redundant [(as it is merely used to intensify or reinforce the meaning of the matrix directive)], since the actual preference or recommendation being relayed is [indicated by the verb that] follows. Therefore, whereas in [(20)], the subordinate [predicate directly following que ‘that’] carries modal force (and is, thus, interpreted as the particular preference or recommendation being instructed), the embedded modals in [(21) and (22)] carry none, [which, consequently, makes them non-regulative/mandatory, if/as interpreted on their own]. [Thus,], in [their] case, the relevant actions being recommended [are] located in the second [portions] of the embedded clauses; i.e., the units following deber – [i.e., the objects’ use [usarse] in the particular early phase and the youth group’s focus [enfocarse] on their studies] (p. 12).

Be that as it may, unbeknownst to Faulkner (2022b) at the time of publishing, this symbiotic relationship between modal concord and mood in Spanish, is not exclusive to matrix and subordinate directives that are weak necessity and teleological.

4. An Update to Faulkner (2022b)

4.1. Mood and Modal Concord Outside of the Teleological and Weak Necessity, Directive Spectrum

Concord constructions (and, resultantly, indicative subordinate clauses) may, also, come about in directive expressions with main and embedded verbs of modal flavors other than teleological, and strengths other than WN (although both predicates still have to be of the same or similar type and quantificational force). The examples¹ below (all sourced and adapted from Davies’ Corpus of Spanish (2016-)) have as their objective to support this recently made observation.

4.1.1. Examples of Modal Concord in Deontic and Bouletic, Strong Necessity, Directive Clauses:

...en el municipio se están realizando los exámenes anti doping a los choferes, se exige.PRES.INDIC.3SG que deben.PRES.INDIC.3PL estar al día con el instituto (no tener multas pendientes).

‘... in the municipality/town anti-doping exams are being carried out on drivers/chauffeurs, it is demanded that they must be up to date with the institute (not have pending fees).’ MC

- (24) ...a las personas que acuden a estos centros y logran una hospitalización se les exige.PRES.INDIC.3SG que deben.PRES.INDIC.3PL de llevar todo, lencería, papel sanitario, desinfectantes y las medicinas.

‘... to the people who go into those centers and successfully get hospitalized, it is demanded that they must carry everything [with them], bedding, toilet paper, disinfectants, and medicines.’ MC

‘The organic law of the development plan (law 152 of 1994) orders/mandates that there must be effective participation on the part of the association under discussion.’ MC

- (26) Todos los bolivianos tienen que registrar las armas. Esta norma manda.PRES.INDIC.3SG que tienen.PRES.INDIC.3PL que registrar, porque hay en las provincias, en las comunidades...

‘All Bolivians have to register their weapons. This rule orders/mandates that they have to register, because in the provinces, communities, there are...’ MC

- (27) ...3 años de estar trabajando en la ciudad de león, como requisito, se le pide.PRES.INDIC.3SG que deben.PRES.INDIC.3PL aportar 2 meses de su trabajo...

‘...Three years of working in the city of Leon, as a requirement, they ask that they must contribute two months of their work...’ MC

- (28) Muchos soldados se enlistan al ejército solo porque se le pide.PRES.INDIC.3SG que tienen.PRES.INDIC.3PL que hacer tres años.

‘Many soldiers enlist in the army only because they are asked that they have to do/serve for three years.’ MC

(29)

...riesgos para la salud humana, los ecosistemas o la soberanía alimentaria, la Constitución ordena.PRES.INDIC.3SG que deben.PRES.INDIC.3PL ser prohibidos (Art. 15).

‘...risks to human health, ecosystems or food sovereignty, the Constitution orders that they must be prohibited (Article 15).’ MC

(30)

‘Throughout the Bible we are entrusted and ordered/commanded that we must obey God.’ MC

(31)

Algunos insisten.PRES.INDIC.3PL en que deben.PRES.INDIC.3PL mantenerse separados con el fin de mantener la objetividad.

‘Some insist that they must be kept separate in order to maintain objectivity.’ MC

(32)

Se decreta.PRES.INDIC.3SG que debe.PRES.INDIC.3SG colocarse una cinta extendida a lo largo de la portería y a una altura de 2'40 metros.

‘It is ordered that an extended tape must be installed/placed alongside the goal and at a height of 2.40 meters.’ MC

(33)

...para la compra de material de limpieza, y nos presionan.PRES.INDIC.3PL que debemos.PRES.INDIC.1PL comprar la lista de útiles escolares, con libros [de] determinadas marcas de...

‘...for the purchase of cleaning materials, and they pressure us that we must buy [everything from] the list of school supplies, with certain brands of books...’ MC

In each of the above examples, we observe that, directive predicates that may be labeled as deontic or bouletic, in priority, and strong, as related to modal force (e.g., exigir/mandar/pedir/ordenar/insistir en/decretar que... ‘to demand/order/ask/request/insist/rule that...’), can successfully enter into concord constructions with modals of similar features (e.g., deber ‘must’, tener que ‘to have to’, etc.). In these cases, the complement appears in the indicative, which is what triggers the interpretation that the main and embedded verbs are to be understood congruently; thus, resulting in the speaker or subject’s true, directive preference being represented via the predicate that follows, (i.e., that which follows the indicative, subordinate modal).

5. Concluding Remarks

With the examples included in section 4.1.1 in mind, we propose that, although Faulkner (2022b) might have reliably put forth that modal concord in directive clauses corresponds with an indicative, subordinate predicate, her theory be modified to include the fact that, the same may also occur with matrix and embedded modals that match in flavors and strengths, other than teleological and weak necessity. Accordingly, we present the following four contexts (updated from Faulkner (2022b)) as determinants of the mood of Spanish, directive complements:

- In mono-modal, directive environments, the complement takes the subjunctive;
- In bi-modal, directive environments, where the matrix and subordinate modals are of different or dissimilar strengths and types, the complement takes the subjunctive and a cumulative reading is manifested;
- In bi-modal, directive environments, where the main and subordinate modals are of the same or similar modality and strength – whether or not both are teleological and weak necessity -, the complement takes the indicative and a concord reading is manifested.

(Adapted from Faulkner 2022b: 13)

In the appendix to follow, the reader will find additional examples of modal concord in Spanish, directive clauses; examples of which may include the following matrix and subordinate, modal combinations:

- Exigir/decretar/ser imperativo que... + deber, ‘to demand/rule or order/be imperative that + must’;
- Ordenar/mandar/reclamar/insistir en que... + tener que, ‘to order/demand/insist that + to have to’;
- Pedir que... + ser necesario/poder, ‘to ask/request that + to need/to be able to’;
- Insistir en que + necesitar/desar, ‘to insist that + to need/desire’;
- Presionar/solicitar/ser inexorable que... + deber ‘to pressure/request/be unyielding or stringent that + must’;
- Imponer que + querer ‘to impose/enforce that + to want’, etc.

As related to future research, it might be useful to investigate how such concord, between directives and their subordinates, may differ depending on the particular tense and aspect combinations at hand, since, many of the supplementary items (included in the appendix) involve combinations across the tenses. On examining said auxiliary examples, we may even go as far as, very preliminarily, proposing the addition of another, possible, constraint: in bi-modal, directive environments, where the main and subordinate modals are of the same or similar modality and strength - whether or not both are teleological and weak necessity -, the particular matrix and embedded directives can appear in conjugations other than the present, and be of differing aspects, as long as the two expressions correspond with each other as related to tense (e.g., present + present, past + past); most importantly, in such cases, concord is still represented by an indicative, subordinate modal. However, a more in depth analysis of these and similar examples is needed in order to, properly, verify or reject this claim.
